Strategies to Fund Operating Costs

Every organization must find ways to fund general operating costs: administrative salaries, rent, utilities, and the other expenses essential to carrying out their mission. But most foundations want to make grants only for specific programs. In "How to Gain Support for Those Pesky Operating Funds" (CharityChannel, September 30, 2009), the article suggests ways to resolve this dilemma by:

- Determining whether any of the general operating costs can legitimately be included in program budgets.
- Focusing the proposal narrative on the services to be provided, their necessity, and their impact on those served.
- If a funder clearly states that they will not pay for certain types of indirect costs, never try to mislead them.
